City of Print: New York and the Periodical Press from the Antebellum Era to the Digital Age

Like serials themselves, the history of publishing in New York can be read as a “continuing story,” with periodicals and their contents representing the diverse, shifting cultural politics of the city itself. Disparate voices of New York’s periodical press contended for the attention of various reading communities, relying on an extensive network of workers and the latest in printing technologies that only New York’s vast resources and talent pool could often provide. “City of Print: New York and the Periodical Press,” a summer institute sponsored by the NEH, will bring university faculty together from across the country to study this archive and explore both the influence of place on publications and the influence of these publications on place. For this talk, Mark Noonan, the Director of this Institute, will discuss new interdisciplinary approaches for researching and teaching periodicals that take into account the important site of their production, as well as relevant cultural, technological, aesthetic, and historical considerations.
